Dulce Et Decorum Est, written by Wilfred Owen. This poem was set during the first world war with Wilfred Owen writing about his own experiences as he served as a soldier. Wilfred wrote many poems during his time of service to help many people from his time and our time how rite the war was the truth behind what people were believing the war to be. Dulce Et Decorum Est is written from a narrative point of view which helps us to really understand what the war was like and how it should not be glorified. We understand the purpose of Owen's piece with the changes in his structure and the way he uses imagery of decay and disease / helplessness and agony.

By the first in the first stanza of the poem we see it is all calm and slow, as the "men marched asleep". Giving us the idea of all the men were filled with fatigue but were at a comfortable state. Until we see the change in structure and tone where the Soldiers were in a state of panic and in an uncomfortable situation, coming into the second stanza. We know this as the second stanza starts with "GAS! GAS! GAS!" indicating to us as an audience the structure has gone from slow and calm to fast and in a panic. Throughout this stanza we can tell it's a very uncomfortable time as shown. The technique of having the structure change like so really helps the audience it was written for and the audience now understand how frightening the war was, as anything could happen at any point.

Throughout the second stanza of Owens poem we get to understand more and more of how the narrative was feeling in the given situation and how uncomfortable he was. We especially see this when it is quoted "Before my helpless sight, I see him, guttering, choking, drowning." This quote helps create the imagery of helplessness as the narrative couldn't do anything to help save the man who couldn't get his gas mask on in time. At this point in the poem we are able to understand how sick the narrative felt having to go through such a horrid situation, feeling helpless on what to do. Which conveys Owen's purpose that we are not to glorify war, that it is not something to talk about with such high zest. Wanting us to understand that this is what men had to go through on a day to day basis, then returning home scarred with these vile situations/memories.

In conclusion Wilfred Owen portrays how uncomfortable the narrator is throughout his structure. Also helping the audience to understand what the war was really like. To not glorify war and make it seem as though it's the best solution when in reality many men were faced with countless uncomfortable situations that they had to get through and deal with for the rest of their lives.

| 3 | M5          | Dulce et Decorum Est

Light on direct detail of setting but lots said in passing. Discussion of techniques is well developed and is clearly linked to the idea of being “uncomfortable” etc. This makes for a convincing response but it doesn’t move much beyond an explanatory level – hence an M5 rather than an M6.
